But this can not be said now, for France herself, whatever her faults and her follies, can not be lenied to have caught her fever by infection from her German neighbors. She saw fighting in which others were winning glory, territory, and sower, and yielded to that instinctive rivalry which even brute creatures exhibit in like aircumstances. Even Justice can not be done without provoking desire. But all the Great Powers, and Powers rison to new greatness, have latterly either gained or lost, either triumphed or suffered disaster. In either case, and in any case, either ambition or the thirst for venguance has been aroused. They who find themselves advancing will wish to realize their political progress; they who know too wall they have been driven backward in the great race will naturally desire to repair the damage. Every nation in Europe has ticians who want a turn of affairs, soldiers who want opportunities, whole classes ready to welcome any general movement that would help them to break their fatters and shift their burdens, and give them one more start in life. Commerce and prosperity are found to do as little to secure as against war as heavily-laden firets to keep down the rising of the wind and sea: The German Emperors, while they have, doubtless, had to think a little of each other, and a good deal of France, have really a most legitimate and sufficient task before them in the preservation of that Peace for which they, above all others, have become answerable. We look to those who actually hold the gates of war in their hands. No doubt it is the first, if not the only object of these interviews to secure for Herope a needed respite from bloodshed and destruction. We must wish our peacemakers every possible success. A misgiving, of course, will present itself. Whether we wish it or not, we may find ourselves reverting to a war of principles. The new Alliance, if it act at all, will have to act not so much against one State or another as against the old revolutionary demone of our nursery days. A European Alliance can hardly fail to be monarchical and aristocratic. The Holy Alliance aimed at a vast deal more than it could do or ever did : this Alliance may accomplish more than it in-

THE NEW ATLANTIC STRANSHIP LOSE - The New York Times says: The Oceanic, the first vascel of the White Star Line, from its vest proop from the northern horizon, seeming in their that can be alleged with probability is that the portions, superb fittings, and fast-sailing properquick play like the flery standards of some celes- Continental Powers might have done their work ties, attracted at the time very favorable notice marching and counter-marching, to better and in more lasting fashion if they had from the public, and many looked forward to gether with the pulsations of crimson waves only condescended to a somewhat lower tone, and | whether the vessels which were to follow would rolling up to the zenith. > A BLACK FIRE KING-HE RATE HOT COME. AND SWALLOWS HOT LEAD .- DOWN in Maryland they have a colored man whom they call the Africas Fire King." Recently, he gave an exhibition of his "powers" to a select company. After applying a red-hot shovel to the bottom of one of his fest, without making any impression on him, also licking the shovel, red-bot, with his toogue, without even drying the salies in his mouth, and taking a red-hot anthrucite coal from a stove, without scorching his hand or fingers inwhich he held it, he saked if there were "unbe-Hevers" present. One individual stating that he remained unconvinced, the Fire King, as the story goes, put a shovel in the store and partially filled it with shot, and when the shot got pretty hot he stirred them with his naked fingers till the lead had multed. He then took the shovel in and then spit it out in a lump. After the latter performages the "unbeliever" expressed blesself entirely astisfied. The Fire King mid it was only a twenty dollar performance; if they would make up fifty dollars, he would show them morething worth sociog -N. F. Sun.
